CHILDREN OF FAR CATHAY, A SOCIAL AND POLITICAL NOVEL.

BY
CHARLES J. H. HALCOMBE,
NON-MEMBER OF CHINA REFORM PARTY.
Author of "The Mystic Flower Land,"
"Travel in the Transvaal," &c., &c.

CHAPTER XII.—THE MISSIONARY AND THE STUDENT.

Next morning Cheng was up betimes and accompanied Mr. Poi over his broad and fruitful lands, in which many contented husbandmen were toiling and singing; and then, for a good breakfast, he bade the genial farmer good-bye and once more resumed his journey.

As Sam seemed to have enjoyed himself as much as his master, and now again smacked his lips or mumbled some expressive ejaculation as he looked regretfully back and thought of all the good things he was leaving behind.

After descending the southern slope of the hill, they entered a fertile plain where the sun shone on a glittering stream, fields of rice, millet, sugar-cane and beans, and fruit-laden orchards whose trees bent beneath the weight of luscious champi luscious and other produce of the teeming soil.

They had been travelling for an hour or two, when Cheng suddenly heard the clattering of hoofs from behind and, on looking round, saw a foreigner, mounted on a very little pony, quickly approaching from the northward. It was Montrose, who had left Lien at four o'clock the morning.

As the Englishman, caught up with the two travellers, he reined in a little so as to moderate his pace. The young student at once recognised him as being the unfortunate missionary he had saved from utter annihilation at the hands of the last remnants of the mob, when the former was lying insensible in the market place. But all his inherent distrust and prejudice against the fang-kuo now returned to him, and he presented not to him a friendly face, but a stern and angry one.

Indeed, he turned off a little to the left to avoid coming into contact with him.

Montrose had no idea who this grave, handsome young Chinaman was; still he felt friendly towards him, and drawing rein, gave the usual salutation by asking whether he had eaten rice.

Cheng answered shortly though politely, plainly showing, however, that he was not inclined to be communicative, while Ah Sam kept close to him and suspiciously eyed the intruder. "But Montrose was accustomed to these proud and haughty 'Celestials,' and rather admired the young fellow for his manly, independent bearing.

"May I inquire," said Montrose, speaking in Cantonese, "what your honorable name is?" "My humble name is Hung Fong Cheng," answered our precocious friend; not returning the compliment by inquiring the name of his interrogator.

"I presume you are a native of Lien," said the visitor, regarding his companion attentively. "Yes, sir," responded Cheng with great dignity.

"Are you travelling far?" "To Canton," said Montrose cheerily. "Have you been there before?" "No, I have not."

"Then you are not acquainted with the route?" "No, I am afraid I am not," said Cheng, relating his frigid manner a little, "but I suppose you are."

"Oh, yes," replied Montrose in a friendly tone. "I rode all the way from Canton to Lien, and, on arriving there, received such an agreeable reception from your townspeople that I am journeying all the way back, though I am a stranger."

Cheng could hardly refrain from smiling at the missionary's quiet, satirical allusion to his own terrible experience.

"Why do you missionaries expose your lives for the sake of preaching your religion to the people of China?" he asked, adding with calm assurance, "Nothing will ever change our religious convictions which form the basis of our home life."

"We come to tell of the one true God: the Father and Son and Holy Spirit," said Montrose. "But if your so-called religion forms the basis of your home life, what forms the basis of your religion?"

"Filial piety," answered Cheng which dogmatic solemnity.

"I cannot help thinking," said Montrose, "that you carry filial piety to an absurdity; for your great sage, Confucius, even recommends a son to kill himself for his father's sake."

"Filial piety is the basis of the Chinese Empire," replied Cheng with ill-concealed eagerness, his face flushing. "It is a far-reaching protective arm, for, after strengthening the home, it goes forth even to the Dragon Throne, and—if he be worthy of it—embraces the Emperor, who is regarded as the earthly father of all children, and the Son of Heaven. As Confucius says, 'a family is the prototype of the empire,' and thus the empire is consolidated by filial piety."

This subject was evidently distasteful to Cheng, so he changed it by asking his companion to explain to him the constitution of the English Government. Montrose did so, entering into and thoroughly expounding every detail of consequences.

Cheng listened attentively and, when he had thoroughly grasped the subject, said, "I do not think your administrative system, which seems founded to a great extent, upon heredity right and precedence. In China moral and intellectual merits are the only things which will help a man to gain political fame and position; whereas it seems that the son of an English peer succeeds to his father's seat in Parliament—perhaps to the exclusion of a wiser and more competent man. Here, honours are bestowed on the greatest distinction I could gain."

"You may not have posthumous titles conferred upon any one here," replied Cheng with a smile. "I am not a peer, but I am a member of the House of Commons. As the father naturally has a pre-eminence of the female element in its system, it is thus enabled easily to transform itself into a woman. Now, in order to strengthen and prolong its life indefinitely, it must gather into its constitution an equal portion of the male essence, and for this reason it becomes fatal to man when in contact with him."

"That for we just saw," he added with an involuntary shudder, "evidently inhabits one of the adjacent tombs, and no doubt the spirits of the departed often make use of its body in order to chastise the sins which living persons commit."

"The philosophers of the 'Middle Kingdom' speak of the Tue-kieh as the origin of all created things. This is represented in their books by a figure, described by two crossed semi-circles drawn on the semi-diameter of a circle, and the two divisions represent the Yang and Yin, or male and female, and animate and inanimate principles which have produced all things. This 'sexual' system of the universe, as it has been called, influences every part of nature; for instance, the heavens and the sun are Yang, and the earth and moon Yin, and this extends to all things, from the molecules of human and animal flesh to the hard bamboo and silken thread."

"The Rev. B. H. Graves, M.D., D.D., in his 'Personal Reminiscences of Thirty Years' Missionary Life,' Vol. XVII. No. 11, Chinese Recorder, says:—'On our arrival at Kwai Lin we found the whole city in a stir. Placeards were posted up threatening the most dire punishment to any one who would rent a house to the foreigner, or sell them food, or receive their books.'

"No, our opinions differ regarding certain dogmas and ceremonies."

"That is bad," said Cheng, "for if there is religious difference, there must be political difference and party strife. Do you religious principles coincide with your scientific ones?"

"No, I am afraid they will never become reconciled to one another."

"Ah!" exclaimed Cheng, with proud conviction, "Confucianism and Buddhism are founded upon scientific principles—upon the wonderful laws of spiritual evolution—the Yang and Yin of the Tue-kieh, which embrace all things, even the atoms of dust upon which we tread. With us, religion is our political ruler, and Confucius may well be called our invisible Prime Minister."

Montrose was much interested in the conversation, as it revealed to him the workings of the Chinaman's mind; but he reserved his arguments for another time, hoping to become better acquainted with the young student, in which case his words would have more weight and would be listened to with less prejudice.

At mid-day they rested awhile beneath the drooping foliage of a banyan tree, and Montrose drew from his satchel some rice-cakes, and handed a couple to Cheng, who was about to take them, when Ah Sam, regarding the foreigner with angry suspicion, cried out, "Don't touch those cakes!"

Whereupon Cheng drew back his hand, at the same time making a polite excuse.

After some light refreshment, the travellers mounted their ponies and pushed on at a brisk pace, for heavy clouds were rising from the southward, threatening a tropical storm, and the nearest town of Yang-chau was some miles ahead.

The light wind gradually died away, being succeeded by a period of oppressive calm, and the atmosphere became thick and heavy; while the voices of birds, the lively scissor-grinding of cinders, and the deep bass notes of bullfrogs became hushed, as if they awaited in expectant silence the impending storm.

Our friends had not proceeded far, however, when a sudden flash of lightning almost blinded them, and was followed by a tremendous clap of thunder, like the bursting of a shell. Then a succession of flashes and crashes rent the sulphurous air.

Montrose noticed that at every report Cheng reverentially bowed his head low over his horse's neck; and, on asking him the reason of this, he replied: "I do this to pay proper homage to the God of Thunder. He, even, is offended with some person in this neighbourhood who has secretly committed a crime, and he or she will surely be struck; for the gods always avenge the hidden wrong against heaven."

"You speak," said Montrose, "as if the thunder killed, and not the lightning."

"And so it does," said Cheng, with a look of pitying contempt for this foreigner's ignorance. "The Goddess of Lightning throws a flash from her mirror upon the guilty wretch, thus revealing his whereabouts to the God of Thunder, who at once casts his destroying bolts which makes those terrible sounds as it rushes through the air to strike the condemned criminal."

"If your conscience is clear, as I am not afraid," he added, jogging along complacently, though now and again making profound obeisances to the mighty thunder god.

Montrose attempted to explain to him the true cause of these atmospheric disturbances, but he only smiled with disdainful incredulity and was commencing to argue in favour of his own absurd theory when the discussion was rudely interrupted by a terrific down-pour of rain and hail.

Fortunately, they were each provided with a large umbrella made of thick oiled-paper, stitched upon a light framework of bamboo, which served as a protection both against sun and rain.

The storm did not last long and greatly refreshed the surrounding vegetation, while a cool north-westerly breeze sprang up that quickly dispersed the clouds, and the sky gave every promise of a fine evening.

As they journeyed on, Cheng's coldness and reserve gradually wore off and he became more civil towards Montrose, who made an effort to be sociable and entertaining, and they chatted together upon various subjects, while the wary Ah Sam grew less distrustful and at length dropped back to his original place at a respectful distance behind his young master.

In the brief time of twilight, just before midnight, they passed through an ancient cemetery in which could be seen several beautiful sculptured tombs, evidently dating back to a more prosperous and magnificent dynasty, some being Omega-shaped and others like miniature temples, approached by flights of steps and ornamented with grotesque figures. But most of the graves were mere mounds, with here and there a tablet or block of rough-hewn stone as a distinguishing mark.

It was a lonely spot, and one well calculated to work upon the superstitious of a Chinaman; and Cheng looked anxiously around as if he feared to see some ghost arise. Suddenly, with an exclamation of horror, he drew rein and hurriedly took from his breast a small jade-stone charm of some sort, while Ah Sam galloped forward to defend his charge from any lurking foe. At the same time Montrose caught sight of a large fox standing upon the narrow path ahead, but in another moment it had disappeared among the grave-mounds. The poor creature had evidently started at the sight of the travellers, and he would not have until his servant had ascertained that it had really fled.

Then turning, with a sigh of relief, to Montrose, he said: "Sure enough that was an old and powerful fox-demon."

"Nonsense," said Montrose, laughing good-humouredly, "the poor animal could do you no harm—not even if it were as venerable as yonder tomb."

"So you imagine no doubt," replied Cheng, in a tone of mild rebuke, "that allow me to respectfully inform you, sir, that when a fox lives to be five or six hundred years old, it has, during its long life, absorbed and assimilated so much of the primordial Yang and Yin essences and sweet dews—which, between sunset and sunrise, are diffused everywhere over the earth—that it becomes invested with extraordinary supernatural powers, and, besides being able to foretell future events, can assume human form. As the fox naturally has a pre-eminence of the female element in its system, it is thus enabled easily to transform itself into a woman. Now, in order to strengthen and prolong its life indefinitely, it must gather into its constitution an equal portion of the male essence, and for this reason it becomes fatal to man when in contact with him."

"That for we just saw," he added with an involuntary shudder, "evidently inhabits one of the adjacent tombs, and no doubt the spirits of the departed often make use of its body in order to chastise the sins which living persons commit."

"The philosophers of the 'Middle Kingdom' speak of the Tue-kieh as the origin of all created things. This is represented in their books by a figure, described by two crossed semi-circles drawn on the semi-diameter of a circle, and the two divisions represent the Yang and Yin, or male and female, and animate and inanimate principles which have produced all things. This 'sexual' system of the universe, as it has been called, influences every part of nature; for instance, the heavens and the sun are Yang, and the earth and moon Yin, and this extends to all things, from the molecules of human and animal flesh to the hard bamboo and silken thread."

"The Rev. B. H. Graves, M.D., D.D., in his 'Personal Reminiscences of Thirty Years' Missionary Life,' Vol. XVII. No. 11, Chinese Recorder, says:—'On our arrival at Kwai Lin we found the whole city in a stir. Placeards were posted up threatening the most dire punishment to any one who would rent a house to the foreigner, or sell them food, or receive their books.'

"No, our opinions differ regarding certain dogmas and ceremonies."

"That is bad," said Cheng, "for if there is religious difference, there must be political difference and party strife. Do you religious principles coincide with your scientific ones?"

"No, I am afraid they will never become reconciled to one another."

"Ah!" exclaimed Cheng, with proud conviction, "Confucianism and Buddhism are founded upon scientific principles—upon the wonderful laws of spiritual evolution—the Yang and Yin of the Tue-kieh, which embrace all things, even the atoms of dust upon which we tread. With us, religion is our political ruler, and Confucius may well be called our invisible Prime Minister."

Montrose was much interested in the conversation, as it revealed to him the workings of the Chinaman's mind; but he reserved his arguments for another time, hoping to become better acquainted with the young student, in which case his words would have more weight and would be listened to with less prejudice.

At mid-day they rested awhile beneath the drooping foliage of a banyan tree, and Montrose drew from his satchel some rice-cakes, and handed a couple to Cheng, who was about to take them, when Ah Sam, regarding the foreigner with angry suspicion, cried out, "Don't touch those cakes!"

Whereupon Cheng drew back his hand, at the same time making a polite excuse.

After some light refreshment, the travellers mounted their ponies and pushed on at a brisk pace, for heavy clouds were rising from the southward, threatening a tropical storm, and the nearest town of Yang-chau was some miles ahead.

The light wind gradually died away, being succeeded by a period of oppressive calm, and the atmosphere became thick and heavy; while the voices of birds, the lively scissor-grinding of cinders, and the deep bass notes of bullfrogs became hushed, as if they awaited in expectant silence the impending storm.

Our friends had not proceeded far, however, when a sudden flash of lightning almost blinded them, and was followed by a tremendous clap of thunder, like the bursting of a shell. Then a succession of flashes and crashes rent the sulphurous air.

Montrose noticed that at every report Cheng reverentially bowed his head low over his horse's neck; and, on asking him the reason of this, he replied: "I do this to pay proper homage to the God of Thunder. He, even, is offended with some person in this neighbourhood who has secretly committed a crime, and he or she will surely be struck; for the gods always avenge the hidden wrong against heaven."

"You speak," said Montrose, "as if the thunder killed, and not the lightning."
